How to Choose the Right TV for Your Space

Before you click “add to cart,” think about how you’ll use the TV. Screen size and viewing distance matter: a 50-inch set works well in a bedroom or dorm where you sit 6-8 feet away, while a 75-inch panel needs at least 9-10 feet for immersive viewing.

Picture technology is the next key factor. Standard LED panels deliver decent 4K but peak brightness often tops out around 250 nits, limiting HDR impact. Mini-LED adds thousands of tiny backlight zones, pushing brightness to 600 nits or more and improving contrast.

The smart platform shapes daily use. Fire TV gives Alexa voice control and tight integration with Amazon services, while LG’s webOS offers a clean layout and broad app support.

Design and aesthetics can be a deciding factor — gallery-style white frames double as décor, whereas basic plastic stands are purely functional.

Connectivity looks at HDMI count and version; HDMI 2.1 ports enable 4K@120Hz gaming and eARC for high-end soundbars.

Finally, weigh price against warranty; most TVs ship with a 1-year limited warranty, and occasional promotions can shave hundreds off the MSRP.
