Picture Quality: LED vs. Mini LED

The Insignia 50″ and 75″ F50 models use a standard LED backlight. In daylight they deliver adequate brightness, but dark scenes with bright highlights can look washed out.

The LG 55″ LX7B employs a Mini LED backlight, boosting peak brightness and tightening local dimming zones. This yields deeper blacks, brighter highlights, and a noticeable uplift in HDR content.

For gamers, the LG's faster response and higher peak brightness translate into smoother motion and better visibility in bright-on-dark scenes.

User Interface: Fire TV vs. WebOS

Insignia F50 TVs run Amazon's Fire TV OS. The home screen is row-based, prioritising Prime Video, Netflix, Disney+, and Alexa voice control. It's simple and lets you control smart-home devices directly from the remote.

Some users note that niche apps load slower in the Fire TV store compared to LG's WebOS.

LG's WebOS on the LX7B features a bottom launcher bar, quick channel access, and built-in support for Apple AirPlay 2 and Google Assistant. Reviewers praise its fluid navigation and platform-agnostic feel.

If you already live in Amazon's ecosystem, Fire TV feels native; if you prefer a more neutral OS, WebOS may be preferable.

Who Should Choose Which TV?

Budget-focused buyers: If you want a large screen for under $360, the Insignia 75″ F50 gives you size and basic 4K HDR without breaking the bank.

Value-seekers: The Insignia 50″ F50 at $159.99 delivers solid performance for secondary rooms or tight budgets.

Performance enthusiasts: For those who crave the best contrast, brightness, and gaming readiness, the LG 55″ LX7B Mini-LED at $899.99 is the clear upgrade.
