Why a Side-by-Side Comparison Matters When you're eyeing a new TV, you're probably juggling three things: how big it will be in your space, how crisp the picture will look, and whether the price fits your budget. With so many brands promising “4K UHD” or “Smart TV” in their headlines, it’s easy to forget that not all 4K is created equal. In 2026, the Insignia F50 line offers a range of sizes – 32", 50", 75" – all with the same Fire TV OS, while LG’s 55" LX7B brings Mini LED technology to the table. These two families represent classic value-orientated TVs and premium visual experiences respectively. This guide will help you weigh the trade-offs and pick the model that truly fits your needs. Size and Space Compatibility Television size isn’t just about inches on the screen; it’s about how well the TV fits your room. Let’s look at the actual dimensions and the optimal viewing distance for each model. Insignia 50" F50 – 45.5"×26"×2.1" (115.5×66.4×5.3 cm). Suggested viewing distance: 8-10 ft (2.4-3 m). Insignia 75" F50 – 68.3"×39.2"×2.1" (173.5×99.6×5.3 cm). Suggested viewing distance: 12-15 ft (3.7-4.6 m). LG 55" LX7B Mini LED – 49.5"×28.6"×1.3" (125.9×72.6×3.3 cm). Suggested viewing distance: 9-11 ft (2.7-3.4 m). In a typical 12-ft living room, a 50-inch TV sits comfortably at the lower end of the optimal range, making it a solid choice for small to medium spaces. The 75-inch model, while impressive in size, demands a larger room or a further back seat to avoid eye strain. LG’s 55" Mini LED falls right in the middle, marrying a generous size with a slimmer profile for wall-mounted settings. Picture Quality & Size vs. Resolution All three TVs promote 4K UHD, but the underlying technology matters when you actually watch.
