Picture Quality Face-Off

The Insignia F50 panels use edge-lit LED with a static contrast ratio around 1,200:1. Peak brightness is about 300 nits, enough for HDR10 in bright rooms but limited in dark scenes.

The LG LX7B uses a full-array Mini-LED backlight with up to 500 local-dimming zones. Contrast climbs near 5,000:1 and peak brightness reaches roughly 800 nits, giving deeper blacks and brighter HDR highlights.

Both TVs cover roughly 90 % of DCI-P3 colour space. LG’s tighter binning and better uniformity deliver smoother gradients, while Insignia offers solid colour for sports and news in a well-lit living room.

Smart Features & Ecosystem Fit

All Insignia models run Amazon’s Fire TV OS. You get Alexa voice control, access to thousands of apps, and seamless integration if you already own Echo devices.

The LG set runs webOS 23, which offers a clean interface, LG ThinQ AI, and compatibility with Google Assistant and Apple AirPlay 2. If you prefer a neutral smart platform or want Gallery Mode to display art when the TV is off, webOS has the edge.

Design & Room Fit

Insignia’s chassis is plain black with thin bezels — functional and unobtrusive. The 75-inch model needs a sturdy wall mount or a large entertainment center.

LG’s LX7B features a white-frame Gallery design that looks like a piece of art. It’s ideal for minimalist living rooms or bedrooms where the TV should blend with décor.

Verdict & Recommendation

If your top priority is price per inch and you watch mostly in bright rooms, the Insignia 50-inch F50 gives the best value at under $160.

For a true cinema experience with deep blacks and HDR pop, step up to the LG 55-inch LX7B Mini-LED — still under $900.

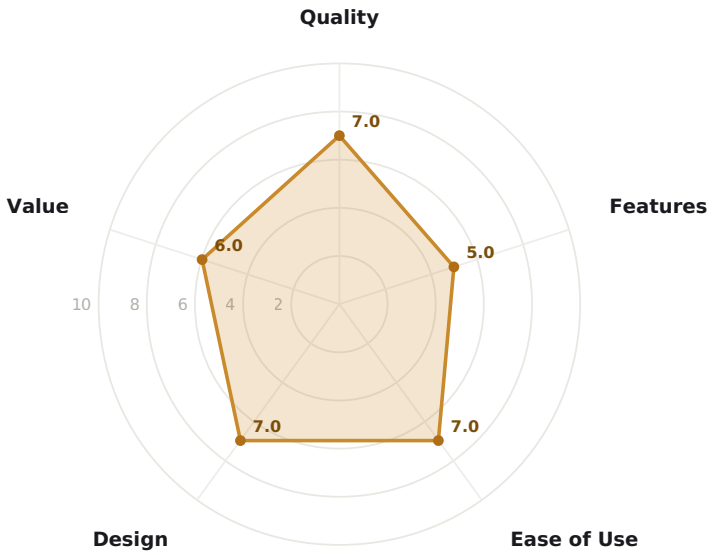

When you need a massive screen for a basement or open-plan space, the Insignia 75-inch delivers big-screen value at $360.
