What to consider when buying a TV in 2026

Start with screen size and viewing distance: a 50″ TV works best 6-8 ft away, a 55″ fits 7-9 ft, while a 75″ needs 9-12 ft for an immersive experience.

Next, look at display technology. Standard LED panels (like the Insignia F50) deliver decent brightness but rely on edge-lit backlighting, which limits local dimming. Mini-LED panels (LG LX7B) pack thousands of tiny LEDs behind the screen, giving tighter zone control, higher peak brightness and superior contrast.

HDR support matters for movies and games. All three sets accept HDR10; the LG also handles HLG and reaches about 600 nits peak brightness versus roughly 300 nits on the Insignia.

The smart platform shapes everyday use. Insignia runs Fire TV, giving you Alexa voice control and easy access to streaming apps. LG uses webOS 23 with ThinQ and Apple AirPlay 2, offering a smoother UI and broader smart-home integration.

Connectivity is key for gamers. HDMI 2.1 (4K@120Hz) is only on the LG model; the Insignia TVs stay at HDMI 2.0 (60Hz). If you plan to play the latest consoles or PC games at high frame rates, that port is a must-have.

Finally, weigh price-to-performance. Calculate cost per inch and consider expected panel lifespan (both LED and Mini-LED are rated around 60,000 hours).

Which TV should you buy?

If your priority is a huge screen for a living-room movie night and you want to keep costs low, the Insignia 75″ F50 gives you 75 inches of 4K for under $400 (check latest price). It’s perfect for casual viewing where deep blacks and high refresh rates aren’t essential.

For a bedroom or smaller den where picture quality still matters but you don’t need gaming-grade performance, the Insignia 50″ F50 is a solid pick at under $200.

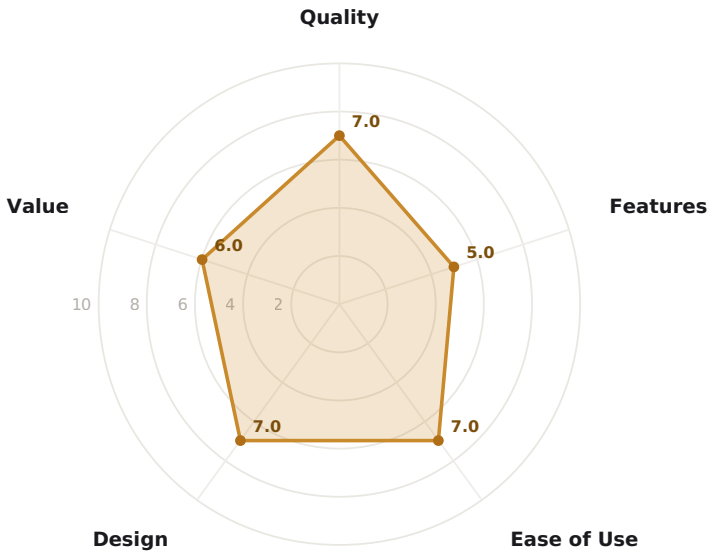

When you want the best overall experience — brighter HDR, smoother motion for games and sports, and a smart platform that works with Apple devices — the LG 55″ LX7B Gallery is worth the premium. Its Mini-LED backlight delivers deeper contrast, and the included HDMI 2.1 cable lets you hit 4K@120Hz right out of the box.
