Quick Specs Overview

Here’s a side-by-side glance at the key specs that matter most when you’re deciding which TV to bring home.

Model	Size	Panel	Resolution	Smart Platform	HDMI Ports
Insignia F50 50"	50" Class	LED	4K UHD	Amazon Fire TV	3 (HDMI 2.0)
Insignia F50 75"	75" Class	LED	4K UHD	Amazon Fire TV	3 (HDMI 2.0)
LG LX7B 55"	55" Class	Mini-LED (Gallery)	4K UHD	webOS	3 (HDMI 2.1)

Picture Quality Face-Off

Insignia F50 50" delivers an average peak brightness of ~350 cd/m², reaching about 500 nits in HDR. Its basic LED backlight gives a contrast ratio around 5000:1 and a color volume of roughly 12 γ—fine for casual movie nights but it can look washed out in bright rooms. Upscaling sits at a solid 4.1/5 based on user feedback.

Insignia F50 75" mirrors the 50" model’s brightness, but the larger screen spreads those 500 nits over a bigger area, making the image feel a touch brighter. Contrast and color performance stay the same as the 50" version.

LG LX7B 55" pulls ahead with a mini-LED backlight that hits 700 cd/m² peak brightness and a 2500:1 contrast ratio. Local dimming via mini-LED micromodules tightens blacks for depth you rarely see in budget LED sets. Color accuracy lands in the 95-98% DCI-P3 range, and LG’s uColor engine refines upscaling for sharper detail.

Which One Fits Your Space?

If your viewing area is tight and you need a set that won’t break the bank, the Insignia F50 50" offers solid 4K performance for under $400. For a living-room centerpiece where you want richer blacks and brighter highlights without jumping to OLED prices, the LG LX7B 55" gives gallery-style mini-LED quality at a mid-range price. The 75" Insignia is only worth considering if you truly need that massive screen and can accept the same LED limits.
