Why should you compare these three TVs in 2026? With 4K UHD now the baseline for most living-room screens, shoppers face a widening gap between budget-friendly LED models and premium Mini-LED designs that promise better contrast and brighter highlights. The two Insignia F50 series TVs represent the aggressive value end of the market, while the LG LX7B Gallery series steps up with a Mini-LED panel and a frameless white-finish that doubles as wall art. Comparing them side-by-side clarifies which trade-offs—size, price, smart platform, and aesthetics—matter most for your specific viewing environment in October 2026. What key decision factors should you consider when buying a TV? Screen size and viewing distance: A 50-inch set works well in bedrooms or small living rooms (≈6-8 ft viewing distance), whereas a 75-inch panel fills a large family room or open-plan space (≈9-12 ft). Display technology: Standard LED backlighting delivers good brightness and colour for everyday content. Mini-LED, as found in the LG LX7B, uses thousands of tiny LEDs to improve local dimming, yielding deeper blacks and higher peak brightness—important for HDR movies and gaming. Smart platform: Both Insignia models run Amazon’s Fire TV OS, giving instant access to Prime Video, Netflix, Disney+, and Alexa voice control. The LG set uses webOS 23, which offers a clean UI, LG ThinQ AI, and compatibility with Google Assistant and Apple AirPlay. Audio: Built-in speakers on budget TVs are modest; consider a soundbar or external speakers for immersive audio, especially with the larger 75-inch screen. Design and mounting: The LG Gallery model includes a white-finish frame and a VESA-compatible mount, allowing it to hang flush like a piece of art. The Insignia sets have conventional plastic bezels and standard VESA holes. Price and value: As of October 02, 2026, the 50-inch Insignia is $159.99 (down from $299.99), the 75-inch Insignia is $359.99 (down from $399.99), and the LG 55-inch LX7B is
